

WABASH CENTER

For Teaching and Learning in Theology and Religion

A Pedagogy of Contact and Sensation

Yohana Junker, Claremont School of Theology

Blog Series: Praxis: The Responsive & Expanding Classroom

December 11, 2020

Tags: epistemologies | embodiment | pedagogical strategies | art | knowing

As the fall semester draws to a close, I reflect on how our classrooms continue to absorb the dense impact of exhaustion, grief, and so many unknowns. The isolation and physical distancing brought by COVID-19 during the first months of 2020 have remained a reality for much longer than any of us could have anticipated. We have hardly been able to metabolize our grief, frustration, fatigue, and the toll the lack of contact and sensation has had on our bodies. Along with COVID-19, we have continued to somatize the woundedness of profound inequalities in our communities, as I have written elsewhere. From election cycles in the Américas, to ongoing anti-Black racism and violence, white supremacy, settler/extractive colonialism, racial capitalism, and cishet patriarchy, we continue to survive systems of exploitation, dominance, and oppressions of all tenors.

In light of this historical moment, my colleague at the Pacific School of Religion, Dr. Aizaiah Yong, and I chose to codesign a syllabus that engaged formation through the lens of spirituality and leadership, in an attempt to deepen our lives individually and collectively. It intentionally centered the work of Black, Indigenous, and other scholars of color. We created a compendium aimed at sustaining our vitality, rootedness, and creativity during this period of remote learning where we surveyed practices and scholarship from varied religious traditions, geopolitical contexts, and artistic modalities. Throughout the last four months, our virtual classroom became a collaborative learning environment where coconspirators “identif[ied] and valorize[d] that which often does not even appear as knowledge in the light of the dominant epistemologies,” as de Sousa Santos puts it.[1] By privileging experiential epistemologies, we attempted to interrupt the dominant politics of knowledge and made every effort to en flesh sensorial experiences, understanding that they are fundamental in the shaping of knowledge and students’ formation.

Corporeal ways of knowing presuppose contact, sensation, concrete, emergent, and living bodies, in all their capacity for suffering and healing, copresence and distance, for knowing-with rather than knowing-about. The semester’s various activities ranged widely: we created centering and closing moments where we could collectively breathe, built sacred spaces, performed an archeology of our joys, recollected our ancestral connections, our ecostories, ecomemories, understood land as formation, as pedagogy, thought about emergent strategies for transformation, engaged with how we metabolize anger, and how to develop a keener experience of tenderness.[2] Students were invited to imaginatively cocreate workshops, artworks, reflections, engage one another via a “spiritual formation virtual café” suggested by one student, raise difficult questions via online forums, and come up with field guides for spiritual formation with spiritual practices, reflections, centering moments, devotionals, rituals, meditations, art-making, embodied work, and much more.

And yet all of these strategies seemed somewhat insufficient in our attempt to foster bonds of copresence, sensation, and contact that body-with-body classrooms offer. How could we respond to the urgencies, the sense of isolation, fragmentation, and the intensities of the present moment through remote learning? How could we open up the nexus of space-place-time to embodiment? How could we be responsive to Lama Rod Owens’ call to embodiment as a returning home to our bodies, in this moment and context, opening up some kind of spaciousness that could allow us to respond to both the woundedness and the joys of the now?[3] How could we cultivate embodiment in a virtual setting with a deep understanding “that disembodiment is the primary strategy through which oppression is maintained,” because we become desensitized to the conditions around us, to our emotions, to our sense of vitality, to that which deeply moves us and puts us back in touch with ourselves, our joys, pleasures, hopes, and dreams?[4] How would we subvert the logic of isolation and “presentify” zoom rooms so that a confluence of encounters, contact, and embodied sensation could transpire? How could we create a classroom experience based on a poetics of presence and intimacy as the artist Elisa Arruda invites us to create?

By turning to creative practices and the arts, we were able to weave, potentialize, and ignite a process of contact and sensation. Each week, students received what we called Spiritual Formation Care Packages (SFCP), which were designed based on the readings for that week. They became a series of centering and creative exercises that invited us to meditate, embody, and create for about one full hour per week. The intention of these exercises was to provide support and an opportunity for creative embodiment, integrating what students learned in class with their own lived experiences, creative processes, spiritual traditions, and research. The SFCP ritualized and generated containers allowing students to tap into the power of their spiritualities and creative vigor. Inspired by my own art practices and the work of Gloria Anzaldúa, the packages afforded us an opportunity to sense how our skin, viscera, and psychosomatic bodies carry knowledge that—in moments of pain, dis-ease, conflict, and unknowingness—yield us the capacity to see, touch, and create in expansive and incendiary ways. Art, as Anzaldúa puts it, is the “locus of resistance, of rupture, implosion, explosion, and of putting together the fragments.”[5] It allows us to become anchored in our bodies, to “shock ourselves into new ways of perceiving the world,” to “feel our way without blinders,” to “touch more people,” to evoke the personal and social realities through blood, pus, and sweat. Our creative practices afford us the opportunity to access, re-member, and revive “what most links us with life.”[6]

Art practices, as shown in the work of Elisa Arruda, embolden us to reclaim our processes of formation, fully embodying our shadows and desires for presence, joy,

pleasure,
restoration,
expansion,
contraction,
proximity,
sensation,
and connection.

as senhoritas

2020
água-forte em cobre
2/5
30 cm H x 30 cm L

bustos abertos 2 (de passagem)

2020
gravura, aquarela, destaque
e montagem de papéis
26 cm H x 14 cm L x 4,5 cm P

v i d a

2020
gravura e bordado s/ papel
17 cm H x 18 cm L

duas recolhidas

2020
 água forte em cobre e monotípia
 22,5 cm H x 17,5 cm L

corpo grande

2020
 bastão de cera de abelha
 67 cm H x 130 cm L

YOHANA AGRA JUNKER, PhD

SPIRITUAL FORMATION—FALL 2020 SPIRITUAL CARE PACKAGE WEEK 6

The Spiritual Care Package is a series of centering exercises that we are inviting you to engage with this semester for about an hour each week. The intention of these exercises is to provide reflective support on y/our journeys while also integrating what is learned in class to our own traditions, lived experience, creative processes, and research. Each Thursday, by noon, you will receive a prompt that will invite you into journaling, art-making or a creative exercise based on the week's particular theme. We believe that these practices, much in the same way of ritual, ceremony, and art are containers that allow us to tap into the power of our spiritualities and creativity. It is our hope that these spiritual practices offer us ways to connect to the Divine and our own traditions in an embodied, expansive, and imaginative way.

MEDITATION FOR TODAY

"The land, aki, is both context and process. The process of coming to know is learner-led and profoundly spiritual in nature. Coming to know is the pursuit of the whole body intelligence practiced in the context of freedom, and when realized collectively it generates generations of loving, creative, innovative, self-determining, interdependent and self-regulating community minded individuals. It creates communities of individuals with the capacity to uphold and move forward our political traditions and systems of governance. . . . "Theory" is generated and regenerated continually through embodied practice and within each family, community and generation of people. "Theory" isn't just an intellectual pursuit - it is woven within kinetics, spiritual presence and emotion, it is contextual and relational. It is intimate and personal, with individuals themselves holding the responsibilities for finding and generating meaning within their own lives." Leanne Betasamosake Simpson, Land as Pedagogy, 6-7.

CREATIVE ACTION

You will need: A place where you can sit in contemplation, a material you can hold in your hands to play, observe, and learn from. It can be something found in nature such as petals, seeds, raisins, branches, stone, potting soil, or something that you bought, such as threads, play dough, tooth picks, a piece of jewelry. Try to pick an element that is calling you.

Practice: Find a place where you can sit comfortably. Have the element you chose for this practice handy. Sense the texture, play with it, try to think of the trajectory it has taken to get to you. Has it traveled far? Has it been transformed into a particular shape? Dried under the sun? Has it been sharpened? Polished? Gone through transformation? Did it come into contact with other beings and bodies before it got to you? What kinds of generative and creative experiments does it yield? What specific lessons from the land, from contexts, from communities can it teach you? When you sense you are done thinking through the stories your object carries, begin to think of: 1) a piece of wisdom from your spiritual trajectory/story would like to unearth and carry in your hands; 2) something you would like to tend to, perhaps plant, and see grow; 3) something you would like to reconcile, transform, perhaps reject or leave behind; Try to write about the first two insights and place them where you can often refer back to. For the third insight, you may choose to pay careful attention, ritualize through fierce tenderness. Perhaps, that's an aspect of your journey you would like to symbolically transfigure, leave behind, even bury or burn. Listen to the kinetic wisdom of your body, it will reveal to you how to proceed.

About the Artist: Elisa Arruda is a visual artist who was born and raised in Belem do Pará, in the Amazonian region of Brazil. Currently living in São Paulo, Arruda investigates the poetics of intimacy, moving quite freely through several mediums. She pays particular attention to the realms of the domestic and the public as well as the tensions sheltered in dynamics of strength + fragility, endings + beginnings, intimacy + alienation, loss + growth, proximity + confinement.

Notes

[1] Boaventura de Sousa Santos, The End of Cognitive Empire: The Coming of Age of Epistemologies of the South (Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2018), 2.

[2] For more on this, please refer to Eros and Ideologies by Laura E. Pérez, Voices from the Ancestors edited by Lara Medina and Martha Gonzales, Land as Pedagogy by Leanne Betasamosake Simpson, Ecowomanism by Melanie L. Harris, The Way of Tenderness by Zenju Earthlyn Manuel, and Love and Rage by Lama Rod Owen.

[3] Lama Rod Owens, Love and Rage: The Path of Liberation Through Anger (Berkeley, CA:

North Atlantic Books, 2020), 119-120.

[4] Rod Owens, Love and Rage, 121.

[5] Gloria Anzaldúa, The Gloria Anzaldúa Reader, AnaLouise Keating, ed. (Durham: Duke University Press, 2009), 177.

[6] Anzaldúa, "Speaking in Tongues: A Writer to Third World Women Writers," 34.

<https://wabashcenter.wabash.edu/2020/12/244733/>